- Popular Podcasts to Check out

- 1. Lux Radio Theatre

- To familiarize yourself with podcasts, it might be helpful to start with a program similar to radio dramas that you may have heard growing up. Look no further than Lux Radio Theatre. Originally a radio show running from 1934 to 1955, it featured adaptations of Broadway plays and Hollywood films, voiced by a diverse range of stars from John Wayne to Judy Garland. Iconic filmmaker Cecil B. DeMille hosted the series from June 1936 to early 1945, after which William Knightley and Irving Cummings took over. The podcast episodes feature vintage radio ads and, in many but not all cases, the original narration.
- 2. Freakonomics Radio
 - According to Alert One, this program has become the top-rated podcast for adult and senior listeners. You might've heard of the book on which it's based: "Freakonomics," by Steven Dubner and Stephen Levitt. The authors now host this podcast to have continued discussions of the ways in which economic concepts fit into nearly every other aspect of life, from pop culture to health and leisure activities.
- 3. Stuff You Missed in History Class
 - Produced for the website How Stuff Works, the podcast hosted by Tracy V. Wilson and Holly Frey focuses on the premise that in history's broad tapestry, there are so many events of social, cultural and political importance that simply don't get taught or emphasized in general history classes. Everything from psychiatric oddities and the people who discovered them to obscure royalty and the Hawaiian pineapple trade is discussed here, so you're guaranteed to find something fascinating.
- 4. The Handyguys Podcast
 - If carpentry, construction or general home improvement are hobbies of yours, then The Handyguys Podcast might be right up your alley - in part because podcasts' nature makes it easy to listen while doing other things. Handymen Brian and Paul offer tips and tricks for home upkeep tasks alongside anecdotes about their family lives and miscellaneous topics.
- 5. The Alton Browncast
 - Amateur cooks (or, perhaps, retired chefs) should try the podcast hosted by Food Network star and renowned chef Alton Brown. You'll hear news about the latest culinary trends as well as recipes and best practices on The Alton Browncast, and Brown often brings fellow cooking masters to aid the discussion.
- 6. Good Job, Brain!
 - Are you a trivia buff? If so, Good Job, Brain! will be your new favorite. This podcast functions as an interactive quiz show and showcase of strange trivia facts across a diverse range of subjects, making it a potential family activity as well as a method for keeping your mind limber. New episodes air infrequently - usually once or twice a month - but more than 190 shows have already been recorded, so you won't run out of material any time soon.
- 7. This American Life
 - Ira Glass's journalism and human interest program, produced by NPR, is one of the most famous radio programs ever, and certainly one of the most popular, with 2.4 million people downloading every episode. The stories on This American Life range from the daily habits of a Navy vessel's crew to ruminations on summer camp. You may like some stories more than others, but there are so many different topics you're bound to enjoy many of them.
- 8. Planet Money
 - Another NPR podcast, Planet Money focuses on economics but doesn't get quite as out there as Freakonomics. But it's every bit as engaging and diversely informative. You're just as likely to learn about immigration's effect on the South Florida economy as you are the difficulties of raising free-range chickens.

- 9. Guided Meditations
 - Tara Brach, a psychotherapist and student of Buddhist philosophy, created and hosts this podcast. If you have interest in meditation to deal with life's stresses or simply to decompress at the end of the day, Guided Meditations can be a big help, providing calm discussions of body and mind in fairly brief episodes lasting between 9 and 25 minutes.

- Class includes Weekly installments of the following topics:
 - Misconceptions about happiness
 - Why our expectations are so bad
 - How we can overcome our biases
 - Stuff that really makes us happy
 - Putting strategies into practice
 - They include video lectures, optional readings, and "re-wirement" activities to do each day to build happier habits. Research suggests that if you do these re-wirements as prescribed, you should get a boost in your mood and overall well-being.
- Podcasts on Mindfulness
 - The Mindful Minute: Trying mediation for the first time can be intimidating, especially if you have no idea what to do. Fortunately, there are teachers like Meryl Arnett of The Mindful Minute podcast, that take you through simple and concise guided meditations that allow you to get out of your own head (and your own way) while learning how to live in the moment.
 - I Should Be Meditating: If you've ever thought to yourself: "I Should Be Meditating," then this podcast is for you. Adopting a daily practice of meditation takes passion and commitment, something that Alan Kilma, the host of I Should Be Meditating knows all too well. Based on decades of experience, his talks and guided meditations can help you learn new tips and approaches to being present in life while moving towards a deeper understanding of your own meditation journey.
 - The Daily Meditation Podcast: We all have 8-minutes to spare, so why not use that time to start your day out right with a daily guided meditation. The Daily Meditation Podcast, hosted by meditation teacher Mary Meckley, guides listeners through a daily meditation that focuses on different styles and techniques to help you manage stress, sleep better, gain focus, and find clarity.
 - Happy Mind Podcast: When you need a quick mental break during the day, the Happy Mind Guided Meditations podcast might be the answer. Each episode provides listeners with a variety of meditations that can help you feel more energetic, mentally sharp, mindful, and happy. And the best part? They are appropriate for anyone from beginner to advanced levels.
